They can be 'featured', and I'm trying to build a case for when a user clicks on a particular element, then the items in the list are all updated accordingly. At the moment I use a public state called featured on the component itself. However, I'd like the list to update when an element is clicked, so I have an onClick handler. However, if I try to do anything like: onClick={(e) => {setFeatured(!featured)}} ... then the featured state does not update. Is it not possible to use a second state in a component that is not the one that owns the state? If so, how can I work around this? A: It sounds like your code is taking a call
